Apprentices

The most common (and sometimes the only) way of learning a trade was to become apprenticed to a skilled labourer. An indenture was signed which bound a young person into the care of a person or family for whom they worked for a certain period of time, usually until they were 21. There were two types of indenture; those issued to poor children, sent to work in order to get them off Parish support, and those issued by Guilds.

Apprenticeship indentures contained the name of the apprentice, in most cases the name of the apprentice's parent or guardian (usually the father, though sometimes the mother, if the father was dead), the place the apprentice came from, his father's trade, the name of the master to whom he was indentured, the master's trade, the place where the master lived, and the value of the premium paid to the master for taking on the apprentice.

This index contains the names and parishes of both apprentice and master together with the length of indenture, trade and reference number in our collections
